Joe was a small colored boy lived down on a big plantation in Virginia more than fifty years ago, in the days when people owned slaves and called the people who owned them master. But Joe had a good home. His duties were to run about and walt on Mr. Winston, but of late there had been a great deal of trouble in the place. There were hundreds of acres and plenty of slaves, but the war be-tween the North and South had brought sorrow and ruined crops and no one to work the lands.

So instead of a merry Christmas, would be a very sad one. Mr. Winston was back home from the army for a week's leave on account of sickness but there was nothing with which to make merry. Nothing but a few sides of fat bacon, some cornmeal and a lean "Well, Joe, what do you think of our chances for Christmas?" laughed Mr. Winston. "What have you in the house for the children?" "Ise 'fraid we ain't got nothing, but some chestnuts and popcorn, Mas'r." grinned Joe. "But I reckon we alls can Winston drew out his pietol, laid Air Winston drew out his pictol. laid it on the table and lay down on the sofa. He was thinking of the two children in their bed in the room above. No toys for them now. For these were war times, and they were glad to get anything to eat. Rough clothing was all that could be had, coffee was made of dried sweet potatoes, and candy was something not to be bought. Even gugar was hard to get at any price. So molasses taffy, chestauts and popcorn would be the Christmas feast.

Joe sat on the rug petting the dog.

As Joe started out of the door to go to his cabin he heard the jingle of wagons. Running back to the house, he grabbed the pistol, he saw on the table and thrust it into his belt. Then, with the dog at his heels, he dashed down the road behind the creaking wagons that were taking goods down into the valley to the l'nion winter quarters. "It's some of them Yankees wid a lot of goodies," whispered Joe to himself. "And maybe I kin cotch one."

Just then the last wagon broke down and the others trotted on shead. There was a good deal of complaining by the was a good deal of complaining by the driver at this mishap, for it took half an hour to fix the broken pole, but at last the team was ready to start. But as the man climbed back on his sea columbia—Burton Holmes lecture, 3:30 Joe came down into the road with his Chleago is just now having this experience. In the La Salle Opera House, under the auspices of the Chicago center of the Drama League of America, the charming little play, "Racketty-Packetty House," is being given daily at morning and afternoon matinees, the engagement having been so successful that the time for the production has been prolonged indefinitely.

Already here in Washington we have a number of plays for children. "The Blue Bird," which was the latest production of this sort, was largely patronized by children, though fully as many grown people enjoyed the wonderful production. We have had "The Poor Little Rich Girl," which is also a child's play for grown-ups, and we had late last season "The Good Little Devil." which captivated Paris when it was first produced, and which repealed its wonderful vogue in this country under the management of David Belasco. Winthrop Ames' delightful offering of "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs" was another child's play which was largely patronized by local theatergoers of all ages, and last season we had Mavde Adams in that charming fantasy or childhood, the boy who couldn't grow up. "Pater Pan," who flew away to the
